

States Where You Can't Throw E-Waste Into the Trash

In most states in the US, it's perfectly legal for households and many small businesses to throw electronic waste in their trash. However, several states have enacted statewide bans on disposing some types of electronic waste in landfills and/or incinerators. Below is a list of these states, with links to their bill language or statutes. Note: sometimes disposal bans are enacted on a local (county or municipal) level, even if the state has no such ban. Those are not reflected in this list.

Quick Summary of Disposal Ban Laws

Doesn't Federal Law Keep E-waste Out Of Landfills?

Not exactly. The federal law that deals with disposal of solid and hazardous waste (the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, or RCRA) says that CRTs (cathode ray tubes) are hazardous and therefore can't go in landfills, but then they exempt households and businesses who are "small quantity generators" from this rule. But they define "small quantities" at about 220 pounds per month of hazardous waste, which is a fairly high threshold.
